NEW YORK, September 26.—(Detraying his embarrassment by the bluntness which sufficed his somewhat florid face, a man who told the sergeant at the Tenderloin Police Station that he was W. W. Wheeler...

Whoever declares he thought it strange that three pretty women should mistake him for some one else, and add he was doubly sorry for assuming their friend so much, A detective was sent with him along Broadway, and Wheeler identified a woman as one of those who greeted him so effectively. She was attracted and...

Wheeler stashed and continued his walk. At Twenty-eighth Street a party thence turned up to him and soon had his arms around his neck, whispering: "Oh, Claude, my sweetest, how are you?"

Another woman, another girl, and Wheeler again continued his walk. At Twenty-eighth Street a party thence turned up to him and soon had his arms around his neck, whispering: "Oh, Claude, my sweetest, how are you?"
